IV. RESEARCH AND TEACHING INTERESTS

Research interest:

My research is concerned with the long-term sustainability of administered currency regimes in emerging economies because, in the face of a more fragile global system, these policies may promote long-term stability, along with progressive social policies, and could contribute to reduce structural poverty. I am currently exploring the day-to-day determinants of country risk indexes and the implications for building progressive public policies in emerging economies. Along the same lines, I am also interested on the effect that the mass media have on the country risk index and on the construction of public opinion about public policy and its effect on long-term policy sustainability.

Teaching interest:

I truly enjoy teaching courses that are relevant to my students and that are fun to teach. For example, Current Economic Problems and Policies, Financial Crises: Causes and Potential Cures, Economics in Film, and Economics in the News. In each of these courses students approach economics from various angles utilizing different materials, including Hollywood-style movies, documentaries, and news stories and they emerge from them with a deeper understanding about the world awaiting for them on the other side of their degrees.
